Comments* In many respects, 2012 should be considered a stellar year for public and private pension funds. Records were smashed and, for years to come, savers should expect to see the strongest bond and stock markets in recent memory. Investors should also be pleased by some of the refinements to the plan-participation rate rules. The changes were driven in large part by the withdrawals made in 2012 of roughly $33.7 billion from 401(k) plans across the U.S. and more than $45 billion from traditional pension plans, according to the Pension Benefit Guarantee Corporation. But all eyes should be on 2013. Next year, the PBGC estimates,

45 plan sponsors will default on pension plans for the first time since 2005, and that prospect could lead to some extraordinarily stressful moments for investors who are counting on the retirement income provided by the plans. (The last record-setting year was in 2008, when 56 sponsors went bankrupt.) But current law

— specifically, the Pension Protection Act of 2006 — gives pension advisers plenty of time to prepare. So how should they prepare? In January, the PBGC unveiled its updated regulations, which will become effective Jan. 1. Among the new provisions are a new category of plan sponsors that have large unfunded liabilities; a new rule that treats a plan's unfunded liability as a pension plan asset to which taxes must be paid; and one that increases the pension plan annual funding requirement to 9 percent by 2019.

Advisers, for their part, will be expected to alert their clients of the new requirements. The PBGC also outlines the use of tax-deferred money in pension plan assets.
